

Center for Public Health Law Research 2026 Summer Internship Program

The Center for Public Health Law Research (CPHLR), housed at Temple University's Beasley School of Law, supports the use of scientific tools and methods for mapping and evaluating the impacts of law on health and equity. The CPHLR team works by developing and teaching legal epidemiology methods, researching laws and policies that influence health to support policy development and enactment, and communicating and disseminating evidence to promote policy innovation.

The Center seeks applications from current law students to fill remote summer legal internship positions to form part of the Center's dynamic and expanding team, which consists of lawyers and public policy professionals dedicated to using legal mapping as a tool to support better-informed public health laws and policies. The Center's current research projects focus on some of the most critical issues in public health law, including the regulation of sexual and reproductive health, drug policy, state paid leave laws, and structural racism.

This internship is a unique opportunity to learn about legal epidemiology and to conduct policy surveillance, which is the systematic, scientific collection and analysis of laws of public health significance. Legal interns may conduct legal research using legal databases and state legislative resources; conceptualize the scope of research projects on emerging public health law issues; and collaborate with Center staff to perform other research, writing, and collaborative tasks such as writing policy memoranda, research protocols, and other materials that accompany and synthesize the research. Interns will support the creation of quantitative legal datasets for publication on LawAtlas.org or PDAPS.org, scientific legal mapping portals that map and compare laws across jurisdictions and over time.

Internship Programming

- Intern Buddies: Interns are paired with a CPHLR staff person in a "buddy" system. This is an informal connection with whom to connect virtually or in person a few times during the summer and talk about the field or their interests.
- Lunch & Learn Sharing: This is a series of lunch-time Zoom presentations during which CPHLR staff share about a project on which they are working or have worked recently, with time for questions and discussion following. This series provides students with an opportunity to get to know things like the purpose of the project, partners engaged in the project and their roles, how it fits into the Center's work, etc.
